

The Roanoke Canal Museum and Trail

The Roanoke Canal Museum and Trail is built on the remains of the original 1824 Roanoke Navigation Canal. For forty years the canal provided safe transportation around the river's rapids for boats laden with goods destined for the Albemarle Sound and beyond. When the river was replaced by railroads as the leading means of transporting goods, the canal was converted for power generation to support the growing industrial centers at Roanoke Rapids and Weldon. Today the dry bed and tow path of the Navigation Canal are a scenic greenway, and one of the historic hydro-electric powerhouses is home to the Roanoke Canal Museum.

Museum Tour of the Middle Locks and Powerhouse

This is a general museum tour where visitors learn about the history and many uses of the Roanoke Navigation Canal from 1810 to 1940. The tour includes an outside lecture describing many of the canal's features, a short video inside, and time for visitors to explore the museum's exhibits. The tour takes 1 hour.

Nature Hike

Historic interpreters lead guests along the trail from the museum to the Power Canal overlook and back. Along the way, several stops are made to talk about various natural aspects according to the time of year. Deer, cardinals, and eagles are only a few animals that are commonly observed from the trail. The hike is one mile long and requires one hour.

Walking Tour of Weldon and the Aqueduct

The Roanoke Navigation Canal's east terminus was located at Weldon and was the reason why a town originated there. Soon afterward, Weldon became a major hub of commerce for both river and rail traffic. The tour is a 1.25 mile hike from River Falls Park in Weldon to the aqueduct, the latter being one of the most dominant and interesting architectural features on the canal. The tour lasts one hour and fifteen minutes.
